The end of the high street? Say hello to the neighborhood co-op. Jul 29, 2018 'Neighborhood' could just be the new type of co-op with the power to deliver a new type of retail. The UK retail industry is in the midst of transformation, with the dominance of big chains giving way to a market where local businesses can compete on unique services and customer service. Large chains are struggling to cope with the growth of online shopping. Brick-and-mortar retailers are focusing their efforts on the high street, opening locations in smaller, 'multi-use' space to attract shoppers. However, the high street is not always a welcoming or attractive place to be, with some small shops fear that young people are choosing to shop online. For many people, the high street is where they shop. Yet as commerce shifted online, many high street businesses have shrunk, with landlords cashing in on the units at an unsustainable rate. Local community groups are branching out beyond the traditional roles of providing social and educational services. Suddenly, they are appealing to demographic groups that have seen the value of online commerce. Neighborhood co-ops have the potential to become the retail space of the future. After a number of years working in the non-profit sector, I've seen the viability of these locally owned businesses. Neighborhood co-ops: what are they? Neighborhood co-ops were born in the '70s as a reaction to the decline of the UK's town centre. Key influences in the rise of these businesses were The Elizabeth Garrett Anderson Institute (founded in 1937) and the Community Interest Company (CIC) (now known as Community Interest Company (CIC)) (1975). Neighborhood co-ops may or may not have a central governing body, but they share a couple of core principles. Neighborhood co-ops are locally owned businesses. They are owned and run by members of the local community who have a vested interest in making the business successful. As a small business owner, you'll be part of your local community, providing goods and services for
