PluralEyes Audio Synchronizer is the powerful audio synchronization and video syncing feature for PluralEyes. .Claude Monet composed a series of paintings in Paris in the late 19th century. He painted a total of 966 canvases in his lifetime, although only 563 of them are now considered to be considered his masterworks. (Canvas #88) Claude Monet believed that a new way of seeing would transform the world in the 20th century. He also believed that it was crucial that art be known in its birthplace—Paris. Thus, he set up a studio within his family home on the Rue Claude Monet where he could study, train his eyes, and paint. According to "The House of Peter," by H.S.M. Millar, he was born in 1840 in Giverny, France, a small village in the area of Suresnes, just east of Paris. His father, Eugene, was a farmer; his mother, Claire, was a housewife. In 1867, Claude's family moved to Paris, where he went to school. Although the family had good financial means, his parents supported him in his career. The young artist, who had a strong work ethic, self-studied with the help of private tutors. In time, the lessons he learned from his tutors shaped his unique approach to the oil-based medium and his mastery of the medium's skills. In 1886, he married Camille Pissarro, a painter also based in Paris, and the couple had five children—Renoir, Claude, Aline, Henri, and Caroline. During the early years of his marriage, Claude painted three-dimensional paintings of the exterior scenes of his family's rural home in Giverny and the surrounding area. In 1892, a fire devastated the neighborhood where he and Pissarro lived, and as a result, Claude sold several of his paintings. One of his students was his lover, Paul Cézanne. The two men collaborated for many years on the artwork that would later be in the Paris Musée du Luxembourg. Soon afterward, Claude got involved with the Impressionists—a group of artists who wanted to explore the new ways of seeing to create painting based on light and its impression 3da54e8ca3
