Resistance to apoptosis and increased expression of nerve growth factor in a variety of neoplasms. Although several chemotherapeutic drugs induce programmed cell death (apoptosis) in tumor cells, chemoresistance (i.e., reduced sensitivity to apoptotic cell death) is a frequent occurrence. In the present study, we have evaluated apoptotic sensitivity of a panel of prostate and bladder carcinoma cell lines and some cell lines derived from other malignancies. The prostate carcinoma cell lines were sensitive to apoptosis induced by either camptothecin (CPT) or paclitaxel (Taxol); however, in contrast, the bladder carcinoma cell lines exhibited a resistance to apoptosis in response to CPT, Taxol, or staurosporine. Furthermore, in the bladder carcinoma cell lines and certain other lines, the induction of apoptosis by CPT and Taxol was associated with reduced expression of nerve growth factor (NGF). These data suggest that (a) NGF acts as a survival factor in some cancers in addition to its known role as a mitogen, and

(b) the induction of apoptosis involves downregulation of NGF, since this would lead to both loss of growth factor and activation of apoptotic pathways.
