At least, not any more. If football was real, there would be a knock-on effect from the coronavirus. If the virus could reach the playing field, it could affect the whole country. Football in general has been in a severe crisis since early January. From the record breaking television ratings, to attendance falling off a cliff, to referees blowing two matches and even the whole league being shut down for a week, football is being hammered by the coronavirus. The small matter of a player contracting the coronavirus too seems like a terrible, unfortunate side effect of the sport. An NBA player, Dennis Smith, tested positive for the coronavirus and immediately announced his retirement. But what about football? The issue is that most people in football have been trying to downplay the virus and the effect it has on them. From the clubs and players themselves to the fans and the entire footballing world. There has been a definite reluctance to admit what is happening on the ground. With some people in football being so quick to blame the Chinese government for allowing the virus into the country, it has given some people the idea that football is somehow immune from the virus and as a result, they don't need to take the necessary precautions. As a result of this attitude, football clubs have not taken the necessary steps to protect themselves. As the virus has started to move in the world of football, many clubs in the Premier League are closing. Newcastle are the first team to actually close their doors to protect the players and staff. Leicester have also closed their stadium and fans are being encouraged to return home. Arsenal have confirmed that staff from the club have all been quarantined and are no longer allowed to go into the stadium. But now there are more teams that are following the same route. Tottenham Hotspur has confirmed that they will close their stadium for a week. Manchester United have also closed their stadium, meaning fans are not allowed in. Liverpool have cancelled their game against West Ham and have warned fans to stay away, despite the match having been rescheduled.
