To evaluate the technique, efficacy, and safety of laparoscopic transperitoneal inlay mesh repair of inguinal hernias and identify the learning curve of this new technique. Between June 1998 and August 2000, 121 laparoscopic transperitoneal inlay mesh repairs were performed in the United States by three surgeons at the Baylor College of Medicine Hospital. Data were collected for all patients who underwent laparoscopic transperitoneal inlay mesh repair of direct, indirect, femoral, femoropopliteal, femoropectineal, and suprainguinal (3 +) hernias. Patients underwent a postoperative follow-up clinic visit within 1 week of surgery and were contacted telephonically or by postal mail after discharge from the hospital. A total of 121 laparoscopic transperitoneal inlay mesh repairs were performed in 120 patients. Of these patients, 82 were men and 38 were women. Indirect hernias comprised 45 (37%) of all hernias repaired. All hernias were repaired successfully without the need for conversion to an open technique. Of the cases in which laparoscopic transperitoneal inlay mesh repair was performed for a recurrent hernia, 100% were successful. Of the 120 patients, 92 (76%) were seen at a median
