Girls with greater lean body mass (LBM) and greater fat free mass (FFM) demonstrate greater cardiorespiratory fitness, reduced risk of cardiovascular disease (CVD), and premature mortality when compared to girls with a greater fat mass. This has led to considerable research effort in determining how increases in LBM and FFM are related to the development of these cardiometabolic health parameters. There is currently a strong focus on the relationships between cardiorespiratory fitness and LBM and FFM, but the importance of nutritional intake for these relationships is less understood. This project seeks to determine the relationships between dietary intake and LBM, FFM, and cardiorespiratory fitness, and to explore the associations of dietary intake to CVD risk factors and biomarkers among a cohort of Mexican-American (MA) girls. The specific aims of this study are to determine: 1) the associations of macronutrients and micronutrients to LBM, FFM, and cardiorespiratory fitness; 2) the relationships between macronutrient and micronutrient intake to biomarkers of CVD risk in this cohort of MA girls; and 3) the relationships between dietary intakes to dietary quality and cardiometabolic risk factors. The findings from this study will be used to further our understanding of the relationships between dietary intake and changes in LBM, FFM, and cardiorespiratory fitness, and will identify the dietary factors that are most important for the prevention of CVD. As a long-term goal, the results of this study will be used to design interventions to promote cardiorespiratory fitness and cardiometabolic health, specifically in MA girls. The proposed study is designed to assess the associations between macronutrients and micronutrients, as well as dietary quality, and cardiorespiratory fitness and cardiometabolic health in a cohort of MA girls. This will provide an opportunity to determine the relationships between macronutrient and micronutrient intake and the development of these markers of cardiometabolic health, such as cholesterol, triglycerides, blood pressure, lipoproteins, body mass index, and body fat. The results of this study will be used to design interventions to promote cardiorespiratory fitness and cardiometabolic health. Q: Regular expression that accepts any word I'm trying to write a regular expression that will match anything that has a ".jpeg" extension. Currently, I'm using the following: `^(?=.\.jpeg)` However, that will match .jpg as well. I'm not sure how to correct the regular expression to only match .jpeg and nothing else. A: You could use an alternation (|): `^(?=.\.jpeg|\.jpg|\.jpe)$` Or even an anchors (^ and $) since you are matching from the start of the string to the end of the string:
