F24474786."If the president says something that I think is, you know, just not something I would give a long thought to I'm not going to even consider doing it," said Atwater, a former political appointee at the Department of Energy under President George W. Bush. "Now, what's true? Well, if the president also came and said, 'This is what I think needs to be done, come with your ideas.' And then they did their own thinking, and I think the results are you're going to get something that's a little more reflective of your own thoughts." Politico: Despite their mutual popularity, there has been some internal tension over whether Trump could be trusted to deliver his promise to cut regulations. Atwater is the kind of top aide who, in theory, would be expected to push back against the administration. But Atwater said Trump had a way of getting to aides because they liked the attention. "He just makes you like him," he said. "All he's got to do is prove to you he's going to do something so you don't want to mess with him. He gets to people."
