This past year, 2012, was a more turbulent time to the human family, in every aspect, than most. As our world struggles to find meaning, as it has so many times before, we are in a season of crazy for God. Seasons of crazy require a vision of chaos and a sense of faithfulness to God. I have been compelled, in recent days, to meditate on just that. On a day of worship and celebration, there was a moment of recognition of how necessary it is for us to explore, to relive our faith in a more conscious way. The congregation sat in silence during our time of intercession. Once a hymn was sung, worshiping God's gifts and calling on our lives, we moved to our Lord's Table. We each received a small cup and a basket of bread. Our pastor stood up. He took a paper and pointed it at us and said: "This is a $1000 bill. It looks somewhat familiar to me. It has four corners. On the first, fourth, and fifth corners, there are numbers. What numbers do you see?" I held it out toward the congregation. I said, "I see $200." Then, I moved my gaze to my wife and said: "I see $300." There was bff6bb2d33

The Web is a very large source of information concerning our environment, but it is difficult to sort through the storm to find real, useful data. For example, it is unclear if the data presented in the white papers on this page are part of the 'real' Web, or if they are a function of a search engine and its crawler. Given that the 'information economy' is the primary reason for the growth in Web data, and that search engines and 'white papers' are the primary method of delivery of this information, it is important to examine the reliability of this data. There are two basic models of the Web, the 'center' model, and the 'edge' model. The center model is extremely simple, as the Web is perceived by the average user as just a collection of documents, that is, the Web is seen as part of the library. In the center view, crawlers are an integral part of the network, and any information provided by them is the only information that is present. The edge model is based on the theory of the hypertext and the infrastructure of information exchange. The key component of this model is the browser, specifically, the client side. This view describes the Web as a network of information. In the edge view, the crawler is an integral part of the network, and information available to the crawler is available to the user. Although the center and edge views are not mutually exclusive, they are mutually exclusive in the sense that a user will not access information that she does not know about. If a user is interested in seeing a white paper presented in a particular place on the Web, she first needs to look for that place. A search engine is used to locate the proper place. The question is where in the Web is the white paper stored, and if it is stored, who has a copy. For the answer to be meaningful, the data must be organized so that both questions can be answered. In an analogous manner to searching a text database, the first step is to create a query. Queries are more sophisticated than search queries. Queries must describe a user's goals and intentions. They must be composed of a combination of structured content, that is, 'subject,' 'dissertant,' 'predicate,' and 'object' or 'exemplification,' and unstructured content, that is, keywords that the user wants to use in their query to find the information. This step is similar to creating a query in a text database.
