That plays with the idea (as Rose Graham from RuneScape explained) that most people don't find the optimal/best way to spend their time. Frequent multi-tasking has been shown to make it more difficult to focus on even the most important task. That task may be - should be - to keep yourself from being blown up by trolls, crazy midgets, and other such raid-style evils.

So playing in different senses and directions can, on the whole, be more satisfying. It also often leads you out of the frustrating monotony of the RPG genre into different and more interesting areas. Some people even find that sitting perfectly still and staring with intent at something fascinating can be even more intriguing than playing battles and leveling up a bunch.

This video is a relaxing fantasy environment. Perhaps it will help your mind to clear a bit when you would like to start focusing on sense-making. To resist the siege of Gorak Falls you'll need to spot the things you need to do with your eyes. For this, I need to be able to run a program in the background while the main program runs, so I can't use a static method. This is how I did it so far, while the start method runs while the main method is running, it just waits for a message in a private event. public void Start(Form form) { // Start a thread to run in the background BackgroundProcess backgroundProcess = new BackgroundProcess(form); backgroundProcess.Start(); mainMethod(); } private void backgroundProcess_MessageReceived(object sender, MessageEventArgs e) { MessageBox.Show(e.Message); } public void mainMethod() { while(true) { } } public class BackgroundProcess { private Form form; private object background; private Action backgroundThread; public BackgroundProcess(Form form) { this.form = form; } public void Start() { StartParallelProcess(); } private void StartParallel
