RISE OF THE LAND OF SWEET BLISS LINE

?Story? There once was a time when the land of Sweet Bliss was divided into countries. However, its people are accustomed to being ruled by a single dynasty. As such, without any form of organization, these countries gradually fell victim to anarchy and oppression. Once the situation grew beyond the realm of possibility, the nations joined together to expel the foreigners and establish a new, united government. However, the people who had been exiled to the islands to the south of the archipelago were unable to return, and even if they did, they were not given permission to travel north. Finally, long ago, a young girl was born at the order of the nations' exiled people

The prediction of testosterone deficiency: where are we with clinical tests? Free testosterone (FT) and total testosterone levels are widely used to predict spermatogenic status and the need for testosterone replacement therapy. Over the past year, many studies have evaluated the usefulness of FT and total testosterone levels. This review assesses the clinical utility of FT and total testosterone when used to diagnose hypogonadism. A MEDLINE search was performed for studies published until August 2004 to identify relevant studies assessing the utility of FT and total testosterone levels in the prediction of spermatogenic failure or diminished sperm production. These included studies from endocrinology, gastroenterology, urology and gonadal gerontology. Total hormone testing in the primary care setting may be of use in identifying those men who are likely to benefit from restoration of hypogonadal status. Recent data showing the effects of testosterone replacement therapy on semen characteristics and clinical outcomes in hypogonadal men support the need for 'reversible' testosterone therapy in those men with significant depletion of endogenous testosterone levels. The value of pretreatment FT testing in predicting testicular function is uncertain. Our ability to predict the spermatogenic status of individual men from their FT levels or from their total testosterone levels is limited. In men with testicular disease, low FT is often coincident with a normal total testosterone. Total testosterone is likely to be useful for assessing spermatogenic function when sufficient data are available. Inclusion of men with azoospermia in clinical trials is necessary to evaluate the role of total testosterone in identifying men who would benefit from treatment., which is inconsistent with the Ponzi scheme theory. The Ponzi scheme theory does not explain everything happening. The things I've mentioned are inconsistent. The explanation that is closest to the real world is the spam campaign, and that explanation is given by first context only, a term in the CAP theorem. But still, why did people even believe that the spam campaign was the explanation, or even equally likely as any other explanation? An explanation of what happened must be expanded to include it. So if the Ponzi theory is
