Why the Strong Will Sometimes Weaken By: Jack Peterson July 26th, 2017 Politics is a tough game to play. We see the top of the field and know that they are great at what they do. Then we see someone we've never heard of try to get in their place. That person is put in a position that they normally couldn't have gotten and their performance is then examined. We might rightly find the person to be a worthy successor, but only when their work is compared to the work of the people they beat. The same thing could be said for a person on the top of a government or business. No one chooses to be in such a high position. It is reserved for only the best of the best. However, it is a place of vulnerability because if someone else can perform better at what you do, they will. The average person is the weak link in a democratic republic. The average person is most capable of doing what politicians or businesspeople do, but it is difficult for them to know how they are doing. Instead of being told, they have to figure it out on their own. There is no way for them to measure their performance

What's new:

■ Story Synopsis　Tarnished Lords (□□□), The shadows that consumed the Elden Kingdom have passed! The Elden are united, their just cause has been restored, and they can finally walk freely in the Lands Between in search of treasure and glory. However, for the Elves, the balance and harmony between the human and Elf races has turned upside-down. While the Elves are overcome with greed for riches, the Dragons have been driven far away. The darkness of the Elden Kingdom spreads into Erenland. In times of peace, even Dragons can succumb to hunger. Of course, as the leader of the Elves, Aramil is bitterly disappointed. Aramil has often plied his trade while listening to their stories about the Elves. He can only deeply lament their fate. Despite having his party members and his Elden companions, the feeling that "I will never be able to save them" remains ever fresh.

Flickr)More than 300 soldiers from the 32nd Infantry Division are serving in Afghanistan, and they still have questions about what they do. Even after an entire year of heading to war, Afghanistan still holds a strange allure for some U.S. soldiers. A photograph taken by Robert Feller, an Army combat photographer embedded with the Army's 32nd Infantry Division, has been drawing rapt attention online since it was published at the Warrior photo blog in July. In the photograph, men from the 323rd Engineer Battalion pose in front of a tank they are rebuilding for the Afghan Army. About 200 people surrounded them and watched as a young man in a football jersey offered his buddy a bag of cookies. "I like this picture," wrote one viewer, "because I never thought I would ever see a working tank, let alone
