For a light-emitting diode (LED) used for, e.g., a display device, a light-emitting diode with a high brightness and high luminance is demanded. As a light-emitting diode which has high brightness and high luminance, a light-emitting diode formed of a semiconductor light-emitting device in which light-emitting layers, each of which is formed of a light-emitting material containing zinc oxide, are stacked in an active layer, for example, as disclosed in JP-A-8-208375, JP-A-8-161626, and JP-A-8-255043 has been proposed. In JP-A-8-208375, JP-A-8-161626 and JP-A-8-255043, there is proposed a technique of forming a light-transparent conductive film formed of a light-transmitting conductive material on a substrate with a light-transmitting insulating film formed on

Blood-feeding arthropods use the epithelial lining of the gut and surrounding tissues as a membrane-like structure for the transport of oxygen from the haemolymph to the tissues. The epithelial cells, and especially the cells of the basement membrane, are highly glycosylated. In this review, I examine the role that the glycoconjugates of these cells play in the haemolymph transport of oxygen by the haemocyanin. The effects of the changes in local (cell to cell) and systemic (haemocyanin-haemolymph to haemolymph) oxygen tensions on the oxygen transporters within the mucin membrane are discussed. While the epithelial cells are particularly sensitive to the drop in oxygen tension that occurs in the haemolymph after feeding, the haemocyanin itself is not directly sensitive to changes in oxygen tension. Rather, the intensity of oxygen binding to the haemocyanin changes in response to the oxygen level to which the haemolymph is exposed. This altered oxygen affinity of the haemocyanin plays an important role in the oxygen regulation of the haemolymph-tissue exchange. A mechanism that uses the glycoconjugates as signalling molecules is suggested. The glycoconjugates have a certain flexibility which allows them to transform between a rigid and a fluid state. An active mechanism for
