Q: passing an unknown number of arguments to a linux command I have to pass an unknown number of arguments to a linux command. The arguments are passed to my python program. The arguments are always the same, yet I have to convert the arguments of my python program to the needed format for the command. At the moment I am using this, but it's not pretty: `string = "C:\temp\python.exe" "c:\temp\foo.py" {}"{} {}" && ' string = string.format(" ".join([command_str(arg) for arg in args]),command_str(arg), command_str(arg), command_str(arg)) os.system(string)` In my case, there can be arguments as many as 8 or 9. I would like to improve this (and make it more robust) and avoid converting to a list and converting back again. A: If you're on python 3, a new string formatting method is available: `string = "C:\temp\python.exe" "c:\temp\foo.py" "{}" "{}" "{}" && ' string = string.format(command_str(arg), command_str(arg), command_str(arg), command_str(arg)) os.system(string)`

Dorsal lumbar rami analgesia: neurophysiological findings. A dorsal rami of the lumbar spinal nerve block is performed via a single entry point for a percutaneous needle into the erector spinae muscles overlying the lumbar intervertebral discs. The aim of this study was to characterize the radial spreading of the block in the spine over the disc by measuring changes in the neurophysiological effects following infusions of lidocaine of increasing concentrations. Lumbar (L3-L4) dorsal rami blocks were performed in 25 volunteers. The neurophysiological effects of each of three concentrations of lidocaine were tested: 2 ml of 1.5%, 2 ml of 2%, and 2 ml of 2.5%. Block onset was defined as the interval between drug infusion and the appearance of spread of a block. Time of onset of the block was defined as the time at which the block diffusion was sufficient to affect the evoked potentials (A waves and/or H reflexes) through the caudal

In the 13-year period of 2005 through 2017, canines killed 392 Americans. Pit bulls contributed to 69% (n = 281) of these deaths. Combined, pit bulls and rottweilers contributed to 76% of the total recorded deaths. | More » Killings of Animal Lovers Gets Attention Cleveland is thousands of miles from the urban core of America's most intense crime problem, but we're experiencing a surge of murders of animal lovers there and across the country that is yielding chilling results. Just this month, Cleveland police identified five young people who were either hit or tortured and killed in broad daylight, making them the latest in a rash of more than 20 animal-related homicides in the past decade. Police have arrested two people, and a third suspect is at large. You can catch up with news coverage by clicking here. On Aug. 22, residents from Berkeley Springs, West Virginia, to Spokane, Wash., came to the tragic loss of their pets. Couples, one dog, one cat, two birds and other small animals were killed by unattended, abandoned dogs. Some of these dogs were so possessed by the demonic spirits of the evil that they had taken possession of them that the owners could not pull them back by their collars and were forced to shoot and kill them in their yards. Until recently, the number of human "similar-to-animals" killings never garnered the amount of media attention that the number of animal-related incidents do. However, the publicity over the past several years about thousands of issues involving animals in custody, puppy mills and e-commerce have fueled an unprecedented public interest in animals and prompted local and national lawmakers to enact laws to protect animals. Animal rights advocates argue that these reforms have failed to achieve the ultimate goal — ending the killing of animals in confinement or for fun. Now is the time to apply laws intended to limit the killing of animals in a humane and effective manner. It's also a time for hunters and other gun owners to temper their joy with a moment of respect for the souls of the nonhuman animals whose bodies are being used to do so. "How far we are from animal-friendly America is evident by the rate at which the
