Brushes range in size from 1x1 pixel to 30x30 pixel in the DTP section, the Mac version being called Brush tool. The simplest option is to select a brush from the menu. However, you may also directly type in the name of a brush or drag an image containing the brush from the Brush tool palette onto your document. For example, to find brushes that are 30 pixels by 30 pixels, in the Windows version, select Edit > Brush Preset > Textur > 30x30. Type in a brush name for that texture if you have one. If you have several textures that use 30x30 brushes, type in texture names, separated by commas. For example, texture Fireflies, Spinach, and Leaf. In the Mac version, select Edit > Brush Preset > Stylize > Textur > 30x30. The next type of brush is the airbrush. These brushes are used to apply effects onto an image. First you have to select the airbrush tool from the tool bar. Then with the airbrush tool selected, from the tool bar, select Paintbrush or Textur. If you have several textures that use this brush, type in texture names, separated by commas. For example, texture Airbrush. In the Mac version, select Edit > Brush Preset > Stylize > Textur > Paintbrush. The spray paintbrush is similar to an airbrush, except it is a four-sided tool. The principle is the same as that of the airbrush. First you select a spray paint brush from the tool bar or type the name of the brush directly. For example, to find brushes that are used for painting, in the Windows version, select Edit > Brush Preset > Textur > Spray Paintbrush. Type in a brush name for that texture if you have one. If you have several textures that use this brush, type in texture names, separated by commas. For example, texture Airbrush.
