Evolution of the radial artery. A large number of successful radial artery (RA) experimental studies have been performed; however, the interest shifted to that artery for clinical use only during the 1970s decade. The purpose of this study was to gain a comprehensive theoretical and technical understanding of RA smooth muscle physiology. Cajal described the RA as a circular muscle and Steensma et al. made it clear that it is not a purely circular muscle. We used a prototype RA tension and morphology recirculation system and determined that, in the absence of oxygen, extracellular Ca would rise and stay elevated until it reached a "critical window" threshold, which is determined by the degree of smooth muscle tone. Two defined regions in the RA are recognized. The first, near the branching from the brachial artery and in between branching sites in the RA, is known as the "protrusions." Over 90% of the transient potentials recorded in these regions can be abolished by excess extracellular Ca, whereas 70% of those at the free wall can be abolished by extracellular K+. Only 15% of the transient potentials at the RA free wall can be eliminated by propranolol, whereas 20% of those in the protrusions can be abolished by high extracellular Ca and 70% by K+
