You want this? ' ; ?> Single phase two stroke reciprocating internal combustion engines are useful in many situations where the combustion and cooling processes can be accomplished within a single cylinder. These engines are typically simple and inexpensive to construct and operate, and they are particularly useful in situations where a low power output is required. Typical two stroke engines include a cylinder containing two reciprocating pistons. At one stroke the first piston travels upwardly, compressing combustion air in a crankcase chamber, and at the next stroke the second piston travels downwardly to force the fuel/air mixture out of the crankcase chamber into a combustion chamber. Exhaust gases are produced when combustion occurs, and the second piston also receives the exhaust gases, which typically pass through a port in the upper surface of the piston to an exhaust port near the crankcase. Cooling of the cylinder is accomplished by drawing cooling air into a cylinder through one or more intake ports in a cylinder head, by an appropriate valve mechanism, and by a recirculation system which allows a portion of the air-fuel mixture to pass through the intake ports and into the exhaust port. One common problem experienced with two stroke engine designs is the generation of noise, especially in high rpm engines, which can be obnoxious in many applications. The noise problem is most prevalent in single cylinder engines which have only one port for transferring the gas mixture from the crankcase to the combustion chamber. When the piston traveling from the exhaust stroke to the intake stroke passes through the intake port and into the combustion chamber, a portion of the mixture is trapped in the combustion chamber as the exhaust gas passes upwardly into the exhaust port. As the mixture is trapped in the combustion chamber during this time, it is squeezed between the piston and cylinder walls, and a portion of the combustion by products of combustion are squeezed through the intake port into the intake manifold. As the piston moves through the intake port, friction between the trapped mixture and the cylinder walls creates noise, and this problem is compounded by the fact that the
