Not surprisingly, Photoshop has become very sophisticated and has many features that enable better image control and editing than those found in a typical graphics program. For professional photographers and graphic designers, however, you want to capture images in Photoshop instead of using alternative applications. This section can help you decide whether Photoshop is the right program for you. Identifying Photoshop's benefits Although graphic designers and photographers use Photoshop for their graphic design and photo editing activities, many people view Photoshop as a program that's more appropriate for Web design. Yet, Photoshop's stability and flexibility has made it a strong contender among other raster-based, layer-based image programs. Before you dive into a discussion of Photoshop, consider the following benefits it provides: Strong layer-based features: Photoshop has layers. Layers support the creation of overlays, which enables you to edit separate parts of an image that don't mix up with other overlays. In addition, you can use the layer properties to control transparency. Powerful editing features: Photoshop offers the most powerful tools for editing and combining layers of an image. You can manually change the color and value of any spot, change the color of a specific layer, perform numerous brush and texture operations, use the Clone tool to remove parts of an image, combine images, and quickly organize layers. Essential for graphics pros: Although any graphics designer can use Photoshop, it's designed for the professional designer, not for the hobbyist. A skilled designer can use the powerful editing features to complete graphic design projects more quickly, securely, and with far fewer errors than she could in other programs. Strong photo editing capabilities: Photoshop has been used for photo editing for many years, and many pros like to work with it for this purpose. Although some other programs can do the same things, the features in Photoshop make it easier to work with photo editing. Photoshop includes multiple paths, precise photo editing tools, powerful tools to make color-matched edits, and the ability to add special effects to photos. Unlimited storage: Photoshop has support for unlimited storage, and you can work with large images. In fact, it's best to have 4GB or more to work with in a photo editing session. You don't need to convert these images to a different format to work with them. Versatile tools: Not all layers and tools are made for the same purpose. A background layer can serve as a background on a project, for example. You can use a pen tool

Q: How do I generate secure tokens for mobile clients I am generating tokens for my mobile client (Android/iOS), for purposes of offline login. My understanding is that their might be a problem for the token's to be generated the server side where I have control on the data and am generating them on the server side then forwarding them to the client. I have read about the token in the form of HMAC of ID's concatenated together. My concern is that I will have to store a list of all the IDs in my app and generate tokens for all the IDs that I support. So my question is: How is this approach safe? Is there a better way of generating tokens for mobile clients? A: I agree with the other answers, that it's not a good idea to do it on the server. You should generate the token on the server, then pass the token to the client and validate it. If the token is correct then you have a secure tunnel from the client to the server. There is no mention of whether the id's are "random" in the question, and you should be able to generate a token of any size as long as the server has the list of IDs which it is valid for. How you generate the token depends on how your client wants to store the tokens it has. If the token is large, you can use HMAC, which allows you to compute a hash of the id's concatenated with a secret. A: To add to what @Sean said, you should not have the IDs "stored" in your Android app. If the user login is secure, then the login information itself should be stored in the user's browser. If the user login is via the mobile app, then the login data is stored on the server and sent to the app via a secure API. If the user login is via the website, then the login information is sent to the browser and the browser should store the login information. If the login information is stored in the mobile device, then all the security issues with a mobile app in addition to the passwords and security issues with storing database information on a mobile device. A: If we are talking about "generate a secure token for offline login" then I would suggest using a Web Crypto Library, like crypto.js. This is how I generate tokens for my mobile clients.
