I am creating a game using Javascript where a number of "frames" can be set. When a frame is set, it will take a certain amount of time to actually load. I have a timer which increments the counter each time a frame loads. The timer is stopped on each frame's completion and the value read is set in the start of the next frame. However, I noticed that the timer does not restart until the whole page has loaded. I have read articles on using an onload handler, but it seems that the handler is not fired until the window is ready to load the page in a browser. This seems to be the case for many browsers

It's like EA Sports have half-assed the gameplay in FIFA after being caught red handed repeatedly stealing from the Spurs squad. The awarding of free kicks is laughable, the backheel and the general passage of play have become a farce. There was a time when a free kick was easily completed in front of goal and now its the most dangerous place on the pitch. Wide players have more time and space because the full-backs are often drifting towards the opposition goal post. The passing game is junk, partly because there is no control over the men on the ball. It's as if the ball is maggots bound together by glue and EA Sports' programming team are trying to aim it. The match engine is surely the worst on the market. FIFA 22 Review – A Flawed Portait of the Game FIFA 20 got a superb revamp and FIFA 15 was a huge improvement in that areas. FIFA 22 is a step backwards in this regard. To make matters worse, EA has decided to completely scrap any elements of the game that made FIFA fun. Football
