How much would it cost to start a company like Dropbox? - wensing My co-founder had a brilliant idea, and we had a basic prototype and were getting some early users. It seemed like the kind of product that would be very useful to many people, and yet it didn't seem like a business that anyone would be willing to pay for, if that makes sense. I don't know if we can start a company with that kind of thing as our core business, but as a side project it was pretty easy. Do you think that we could build a business like that today? Would a company like Dropbox be able to make that kind of product by charging users to buy accounts? Would there be room for such a business at all? ===== jeffepp Read up on You can't necessarily guarantee that you'll be able to launch a company that makes Dropbox-like products today ( or tomorrow ) but they were able to start a company with a product that few had in their portfolio. They just did it. An MQ-9 Reaper from the U.S. Air Force's 1st Special Operations Wing flies over Afghanistan in July 2010. The Air Force is looking for closer contracts with Boeing and Raytheon for a next-generation UAV, and is discussing the idea of buying a larger, stealthy version. When it comes to the problem of how to control a drone "killer-reaper" thousands of miles from the battlefield, the U.S. Air Force might want to consider getting a second opinion. The Air Force's drone program has spawned a new category of 6d1f23a050
