Various techniques exist for reducing the amplitudes of undesirable noise signals in a communications or electronic system. If an electronic system is a telephone system, for example, the undesirable noise signals may include electric and magnetic fields surrounding a telephone. For example, inductive and capacitive coupling produce noise signals, or interference, in the electric and magnetic fields surrounding a telephone. It is known to incorporate a resistor in the housing of a telephone to cancel noise signals in the housing of the telephone. However, such resistors are often inserted into the printed circuit board and mounted in close proximity to the electronic circuitry. For example, a resistor may be surface mounted on the printed circuit board. This approach is undesirable because resistor insertion into a printed circuit board increases the cost of manufacturing, and increases the required space for the printed circuit board. Thus, it would be desirable to provide an insertable noise cancel 6d1f23a050
